

Church-based Scouting alternatives attract interest

May 17, 2013

WASHINGTON (RNS)—Their members say pledges. They earn merit badges. They may go camping. But they're not Boy Scouts.

Across the country, decades-old religious organizations such as Pathfinders for Seventh-day Adventists, Royal Ambassadors for Southern Baptists and Royal Rangers for Assemblies of God offer alternatives to Scouting.

Royal Ambassadors participate in a Pinewood Derby race. And as the Boy Scouts of America considers whether to change its membership policy to admit gay members but continue its ban on gay leaders, some of these groups are fielding inquiries from people concerned about the action the Scouts may take.

Leaders of the Seventh-day Adventist Church's Pathfinders have been asked about their program in light of the pending Boy Scout vote, said James Black, the Adventists' North American director of youth ministries.

"If individuals saw the Pathfinders as a viable option for their children, we would welcome them with open arms,” he said.

Some denominational leaders with strong ties to the Boy Scouts—including Roman Catholics and United Methodists—have said they still are mulling the Scouts’ proposed change, which will face a vote during the organization’s May 22-24 annual meeting.

Mormons satisfied

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which hosts more Scout troops than any other organization, said it is “satisfied that BSA has made a thoughtful, good-faith effort” with the proposed resolution.

But Frank Page, president of the Southern Baptist Convention’s Executive Committee, said the change “would force sponsoring churches to subordinate their convictions to stay involved with the Boy Scouts.”

A recent story in Baptist Press included tips on how a church can start a Royal Ambassadors program. About 3,000 Baptist churches have chapters of the missions-focused program for elementary school boys.

Steve Heartsill, managing editor of the program’s curriculum, said there has been “some uptick in phone calls” as the vote approaches.

Increasing interest

The Assemblies of God offices in Springfield, Mo., have received many calls in the last few months about its Royal Rangers program.

Dick Broene, executive director of the Calvinist Cadet Corps, said his evangelical organization heard from Scout leaders who had considered leaving the BSA when it appeared the group might approve including gay leaders. The Calvinist Cadet Corps includes Bible lessons in weekly meetings and connects merit badges to Scripture.

“We are very similar in many ways, with the merit badges and rank advancement, uniforms and emphasis on camping,” said Broene, whose organization drew 1,200 participants to a 2011 triennial camporee in Michigan. “The difference is we have Christ at the heart of everything we do.”

Like the Calvinist Cadet Corps, the CSB (Christian Service Brigade) Ministries is not connected to a particular denomination. It recently moved from Wheaton, Ill., to Hamburg, N.Y., and has fielded inquiries.

“We are difficult to find,” said Dale Kinkade, CSB Ministries’ Ohio Valley regional director, who is handling Scout-related calls. “Despite that, we have had quite a few inquiries of who and what we are.”

The evangelical group is not as outdoors-oriented as the BSA, Kinkade said, but it has a “Shape N Race Derby” that resembles the Scouts’ Pinewood Derby races. It also features the rank of “Herald of Christ,” which is similar to the Boy Scouts’ Eagle Scout.

“Our goal is to go beyond raising up character, and especially in citizenship, but really focuses in on building up a young man who has awareness of a personal relationship with Jesus Christ,” he said.

Opposing new policy

Supporters of OnMyHonor.net, a new organization spearheading efforts to oppose the BSA policy change, said in a recent simulcast some Scout-affiliated church groups are considering pulling out if the vote doesn’t go their way. Religious groups charter 70 percent of the Scout-sponsoring organizations.

“That relationship is at risk, as is the future of one of the last nonreligious institutions that has not yielded to political correctness,” said a narrator of the simulcast, which was hosted by the Family Research Council.

Some religious Scout leaders said they have not had any inquiries from people wondering about Scouting alternatives.

“We have no plans to offer alternatives,” said Larry Coppock, the United Methodist Church’s national director of Scouting ministries.

Chip Turner, a Baptist who serves as national chairman of the BSA’s Religious Relationships Task Force, said he’s grateful the Scouts delayed the process about a potential policy change. Now, he said, it’s a matter of prayer as the task force gathers at the BSA annual meeting before the vote occurs.

“I have asked several task force members from various faith groups to lead us in a season of prayer for divine guidance in the voting process,” he said.